

COMPETITION--What Is It?

Ordinarily it means two or more firms endeavoring to sell the same class of goods to one person.

On what basis can the buyer judge--whose goods must he buy in order to get full value for his money--is price the prime factor--does quality enter into consideration?

If you are interested in quality at prices which will appeal to every one, we ask you to inspect these beautiful Wedding presents.

BIG CONVENTIONS

Assemblages Are Complete Picture of Composite America.

WE NOT MERELY POLITICAL

To the traveler who happens into a city where one of our big national conventions is being held, or to any one making his first pilgrimage to one of these affairs, there is much of interest to be observed in addition to the politicians themselves. There are no gatherings like them. Religious bodies and nonreligious organizations with a country wide membership may hold interesting meetings that draw together folks from the two oceans, the north and the south, but it takes a national convention of one or the other of the two great parties to present a composite picture of "Uncle Sam," a picture which once seen is never forgotten.

He begins to pour into a convention town long before the real show begins--the composite American. He comes with him the costume characteristic of his community and of his particular section under the flag. You can tell him frequently by his clothes, the big hat of the plains or the more conventional attire of the east. Bankers mix with the boys from the range, men from the south with men from the north and to what this composite American was in the past have been added the swarthy features of the Philippines, Hawaii and Porto Rico. When he comes in all his glory once every four years to help in naming a man for president he almost always brings his women folk with him.

Women's Active Part.

The women one sees at these great shows are just as interesting as the men; also they are just as interested as the men in what is going on. They stand around and talk in hotel corridors; they parade the streets wearing badges; they wave flags in restaurants for their particular candidates. They are part and parcel of America's biggest show. The typical woman of the convention is out for votes for men for some particular man whom her husband or brother favors. She visits the headquarters of other delegations, where she meets the women of other states, and she urges them to urge their husbands or brothers to come out for the man her husband favors. She does this when her husband is busy with the men either at the convention hall or in the turbulent hotel corridors. But there are times when the two are seen together sightseeing and having the time of their lives.

The state headquarters afford perhaps more joy to the women of a convention than to the men. The political purpose of these headquarters is obvious, but really not a great deal goes on at them most of the time that has to do with politics. But as calling places, as bureaus of information, as exchanges for news of sons and daughter who have shifted abodes and as general state boasting bureaus they are one of the unique institutions which a convention brings forth.

One has not done a convention properly until he has made the round of these headquarters. The women have done most of the decorating, and it's a matter of state pride with them. California fills their rooms with a sort of pure food show. On tables they lay out those fairy fruits for which their state is famous, and you have only to enter to eat. Kansas brings her golden grains and her wheat, and so it goes. The conservative eastern states do not go into the thing in this way, and their headquarters don't begin to be as interesting.

Social Meetings Too.

At these headquarters, usually consisting of a suite of several rooms, social meetings take place entirely apart from politics; the women wear their prettiest gowns, and you go away declaring that you never saw anything lovelier than those girls from Texas, only to enter another headquarters and be overwhelmed by a bevy of beauties from the northwest. If you come from the east you want to travel home with all of them and see what these homes in that faraway country are like.

A convention thus is more than a political gathering. It enables the American to rub elbows with himself. The lobbies of the principal hotel for a week are places for the exchange of general information, for crop news, for sports news, all that make up the merits of one state or one section as compared with another. And these hotel corridors are great sights to themselves. Hundreds of men and women are packed in the galleries of these hotels, and you can't have a promenade without bumping into the man who doesn't know it looks as though the real work of the convention was being done right there, but it isn't. There are quiet rooms on the floor above all these hubbubs where men are being born, and the same upstairs is where the women are being born.

Political Parties

There are political parties, but not much of the political business is transacted in the headquarters. The political parties are more or less separate from the social life of the convention. In fact, the social life of the convention is quite separate from the political.
